ERISA: Failure to Present "Objective Findings of Impairment" Supports Denial of Mental Disability Claim

Boom: The ERISA Law Blog

You know that courts can expect a claimant to establish "objective evidence of impairment" from a physical condition. But does this apply to claims arising out of a mental condition? Courts can require the claimant to establish objective impairment related to a diagnosable mental condition, too. Here's the case of Gailey v Life Insurance Company...
